Young Explorers Missing

Reports are coming in from the Icelands that earlier this week four child explorers were separated from their expedition party. The children were part of an expedition led by Felix Fitzroy Starflake of The Polar Bears Explorers Club. The explorers were hoping to be the first to reach the coldest part of the Icelands.

It is believed that soon after their arrival the bridge the explorers were travelling over broke and the children became separated. The children all aged 13 all belong to the four most esteemed explorers clubs in the world; Shay Silverton Kipling, the son of the ship's captain, Ethan Edward Rook an ocean explorer, Beanie, half elf and medic and for the first time ever a female explorer; Stella Silverton Starflake, daughter of Felix Fitzroy Starflake

The news came via a telegram wired to the The Polar Bear Explorers Club headquarters. Although concerned the parents of all the children felt they had ample supplies and if they kept their wits about them they could survive the extreme conditions. The main concern is the unknown of the Icelands, Yetis and other creatures.

Members of The Ocean Squid Explorers Club are said to be very concerned, the clubs president had already lost one of his sons so they are very concern about Ethan. Shay Silverton's club were not at all concern, "That boy could survive anything and if he has his wolf with him he will be able to fight of the deadliest creatures." a spokesperson told our reporter. Beanie's family felt that Beanie would make the most of the situation and keep his head about him.

The Aunt of Stella wasn't so positive, "I knew if you took a girl on a mission like this only bad things would happen."

The clubs have pulled their resources together and decided to send a ship with hardy explorers on board to help search for the children. Meanwhile all channels of communication have been left open in case any news is received.
