

Then with a click the window flew open. I felt a glint of hope coming from the vast blue oceans of this spectacular planet, it felt as if I created a planet of awe and wonder. A twinkling light lit up the horizon, giving a sign of habitable in my own eyes. Disbelief was rushing through my head, as I encountered this planet that has possibly saved over 7 billion people in the world. The land below us was mounted by sunlight's golden rays, but westward, islands blocked out the shafts of blaze like tree's branches inhaling the sun's rays. A crystalized, overseas planet lie in the galaxy's downward sky. It was truly unimaginable.

I was speechless, exhausted and managed many sighs of relief. I wouldn't stop glancing at this planet, it felt like it had enhanced my eyesight. Determination in my eyes, I was in desperate need to figure out if this sensational creation was necessary and could suggest a place for the human race. Dark-dimmed clouds surrounded the land below us, only allowing opaque oceans to prove their beauty. Much pain I gathered for hours as worth it, I could finally feel my unimaginable joy that fills up my body, I now know that I could've saved over 7 billion people. All the mayhem payed off, now I have found a marvellous foundation giving many opportunities to save life.

How can I describe the thing I saw?

I was shocked. I was speechless. I was frozen in time. A spectacular smell leaked out of the flower. An acrylic appetiser. It owned ebony black leaves, spiky like a knife and petals that danced in between the fingers of the wind. The strong stem carefully placed the flower in time with the breeze. Slowly, the fragile flowers peaked to their top leading itself to towering heights that could not be stopped. Roots like branches reached into the unknown of the soil beneath our feet. Luscious leaves had grown my attention. "It is a seed!" what could this mean 'life!?'
